As far back as I can remember, my conscious and unconscious feeling every moment was: what do I have to do next? Now, for quite some time, the feeling has been: let us see what happens next.

There is a big difference between normal "curiosity" about the result of any action, which is totally different from "expectation" about the result. The basis of "expectation" is desire for, wanting, something which is not there in normal curiosity.

My guru told me: "I am That." I am telling you: "THAT is me." If you can see the difference, well and good; if you don't, don't worry.

It is astonishing how easily one forgets the basic fact of life that the basis of the mechanism of daily living is duality, and that, therefore, unless we knew what discomfort is, we simply could not know and appreciate "comfort". It is because of this fact that we grumble and complain and whine so much about how difficult life is.

It is an interesting fact of life that inspite of a lifetime of experience that the result of any action has never been in his control, the human being acts, in the next situation, as if he has always been in control of his life and does precisely what he feels he should do. This is because "free will" has been ingrained in the human being as a birthright — or is it birth-liability?!
